Walter Relieves Boehling in Eighth, When Southpaw Develops a Wild Streak.

By WILLIAM PEET.

With a merry rattle of bats in the fourth inning yesterday the Nationals drove Babe Ruth, Boston's giant southpaw, from the slab, nicked George Foster, the relief hurler, for a two-bagger, shot over a quartet of tallies and wrested the final grame of the series at 2.

The game was a good one from start to finish. Joe Boehling and Walter Johnson, the Washington pitchers, allowed between them three scattered hits. The Nationals picked out the fourth inning for their rally and made the most of every opportunity.

their work just as if nothing happened.

The only indication of subsequent trouble' came when one of Boehling's wild shoots upset Larry Gardner, and then Catcher Thomas shouted to the press box, his remarks being directed to the Washington baseball writes—"Hey you guys, how about that for the bean ball."

The defensive. Davis kept up the bang attack and eventually wore down the man who upset the dope in his match with Church.

The tall tenniser from out of the West was seen at his best. Although wild at times, he conserved his pinch drives until the brainy Doyle could be caught off his balance. Then Davis would whale them across.

to "cut out the rough stuff" and there was no further trouble; everything was as peaceful as a Sunday school picnuic.

Rival Managers in Stands.

As both Managers Carrigan and Griffith are under suspension, the pilots directed the destinies of their teams from grandstand boxes near their respective dugouts Manager Carrigan and Owner Lan-nin were together.

The explosion of Babe Ruth, coming as it did with a loud report, was so sudden that the crowd fairly gasped when hits began to come thick and fast, for until the fourth Ruth had fanned five batsmen the fourth Ruth had fanned five batsmen and turned back the Nationals as fast as they walked up to the plate.

Two bunched errors and a long fly gave the Red Sox a smokeless tally in the third, and another bobbed up in the fourth, when Gainer walked and Walker RALLY IN NINTH

Joe Boehling started to wobble in the eighth, passing the first two men who faced him. Griff had Walter Johnson the way in the third inning, when he hi sharply to Shanks, who first fumbled and then pegged over Williams' head. Befor-the ball could be recovered, Scotty was on second base. Cady laid down a burn on second base. Cady laid down a bun and Boehling fell all over himself tryin, to scoop up the ball. When the dus cleared Scott was on third and Cady of first. Ruth gave Milan a long fly, an settled down and retired the next tw

With one down in Boston's half of the fourth, Gainer drew a pass. Clarence Walker drove the ball between Moeller and Milan for a double, scoring Gainer. A wild pitch put Walker on third. Gard-ner grounded to Boehling, and Walker was turned back at the plate. Boehling

Griffmen Win the Game.

Walter Johnson took up the burden and right off the reel pitched out to Henry, who caught George Foster flat-footed napping off second base. This spoiled a Red Sox batting rally, while in the ninth after Henriksen, batting for Gainer, had singled. Walker hit into a double play and the game was over when Gardner filed to Rondeau. If the crowd expected any show of bad blood between the players of the rival clubs owing to Friday's free-for-all, it was disappointed, for the men went to their work just as if nothing had happened.

The only indication of subsequent trouble came when one of Boehling's the man who unset the dore in his match.

Doyle's brilliant net placing sputtered throughout the match, and his deft volley obs thrilled the gallery. There were times when his wit and chop caught the title winner chained to the clay. Doyle was visibly weaker than at any other time during the classic. The drives of his rival were so potent that he could not keep Davis away from the net—his nly salvation in this kind of a match. If Doyle could have done this—confining his attack to his accurately placed net shots—he might have won. However, Davis' smashing drives brooked uncertain returns and Doyle's net play suffered
